1. Preformulation study is a phase which is initiated once the new molecule is seeded. In a broader way it deals with studies of physical, chemical, analytical and pharmacological properties related to molecule and provides also about suitable modification in molecule to show a better performance.
 2. Preformulation is the stage of development during which the physicochemical properties of the drug substance are characterised and established. Knowledge of the relevant physicochemical and biopharmaceutical properties determines the appropriate formulation and delivery method for Pre-Clinical and Phase I studies.
